

HEADNOTE

“1. If their party representatives do not have the language skills necessary to participate in the oral proceedings, the party is free to engage an interpreter at its own expense for the oral proceedings, provided that it notifies the registry thereof within the prescribed time limit.

2. The court's provision of simultaneous interpretation is in any event excluded if the claimant's party representatives are competent in one of the procedural languages admitted at the local division and the claimant nevertheless chooses another procedural language that is also admitted at the local division in question, despite the lack of language skills of its party representatives.”

SUMMARY

The Local Division in Düsseldorf issued a procedural order concerning a light emitting diode patent. The patent at issue relates to light emitting diode technology. According to the headnotes of the decision, parties may engage their own interpreters for oral proceedings. This option is available if the party notifies the court registry within the required time limit. Furthermore, the court will not provide simultaneous interpretation in certain circumstances. Specifically, if a claimant's representatives are competent in one of the procedural languages available at the local division, the court excludes its interpretation services. This exclusion applies when the claimant chooses a different permitted procedural language despite its representatives lacking the necessary language skills.
